Curious about the aircraft in the center island on Spirit of St. Louis Blvd??

It is a McDonnell F101 Voodoo

Developed from the XF-88 prototype interceptor that first flew in 1948, the F-101 Voodoo was conceived as a long-range escort fighter for USAF Strategic Air Command B-36's. The F-101 was never going to have the range to stay with the intercontinental bombers but with the still impressive range of over 2414km/1500 miles, the Voodoo went on to a lengthy career as an interceptor and the first USAF supersonic reconnaissance aircraft. The prototype F-101A first flew in September 1954, and after entering USAF service in 1957 the F101 was used in a number of speed and endurance record attempts, which were intended to show the Soviets just how fast and far USAF fighters could go. On November 27, 1957, four RF-101As (reconnaissance versions) took off from California and after refueling in flight, two of the aircraft landed at McGuire Air Force Base, New Jersey, while the other two turned around and landed back at March Air Force Base in California on the other side of the continental United States. Meanwhile, Major Adrian Drew, flying an F-101A at Edwards Air Force Base, set a new absolute speed record of 1942.97kph/1207.34mph. All these record-breaking flights earned the Voodoo the nickname "One-Oh-Wonder." The two-seat all-weather F-101B first flew in 1957. In service it had a Hughes fire-control system and was armed with six Falcon air-to-air missiles, or two Genie nuclear-tipped air-to-air missiles and four Falcons.

Fifty-six surplus Voodoos were transferred to the Royal Canadian Air Force in 1961 as CF-101Bs. A decade later these were replaced by more capable ex-USAF aircraft that continued in RCAF service until 1985. USAF and RCAF Voodoos guarded the polar approaches to North America against Soviet bombers.

The last US Air Force F101 was retired in 1971, while the last Air National Guard F-101s were retired in 1983. Reconnaissance versions of the Voodoo were also supplied to the Chinese Nationalist Air Force.
